I have more than 30 years experience as a Senior Scientist, administrator and educator within government, academic, clinical and research settings. Since joining the NIH in 1998, I have had experience in the development, implementation and management of large, complex NIH extramural research programs. While working in academia, I served as the Principle Investigator of eight extramural research grants and contracts, as well as serving as a scientific reviewer for a number of groups, including the NIH and the Department of Defense. I held faculty positions in Schools of Public Health, Medicine and Nursing, and have served on Institutional Review Boards. Earlier in my career, I founded what is now the largest professional oncology society, the Oncology Nursing Society (ONS), which currently has 37,000 members worldwide.
